Two Journals Added to Johns Hopkins Press Catalog

The Johns Hopkins University Press has added two publications to the impressive collection published by its Journals Division. The oldest continuously operating university press in the country, JHU Press publishes more than 60 scholarly journals.

Historically Speaking, an official publication of The Historical Society, has joined the JHU press list of titles for 2009. Published five times a year, Historically Speaking features lively essays, interviews and forums on all aspects of history, historiography, and current affairs. Topics in upcoming issues of the journal include history in fiction, history and the wider public, and the state of military and intellectual history.

“Historically Speaking occupies a unique niche in historical journals. In our pages, leading and innovative historians weigh in on all manner of historical topics. Historically Speaking is a convenient and accessible venue for the non-specialist reader to gain a better sense of what is happening across the spectrum of historical inquiry. We are delighted to join the JHUP journal collection,” says Senior Editor Donald A. Yerxa.

Victorian Periodicals Review also joins the JHUP list of journals in 2009. The official journal of the Research Society for Victorian Periodicals, The Review serves as the only refereed journal on the editorial and publishing history of Victorian periodicals. Published quarterly, The Review features work which stress the importance of periodicals for an understanding of the history and culture of Victorian Britain, Ireland, and the Empire.

“We are very excited about our association with the Johns Hopkins University Press and look forward to a long and productive scholarly relationship,” says Editor Kathryn Ledbetter.
